Project Humanities explores the ways we connect with each other and make meaning of our shared experiences.

Support this effort: humanities.asu.edu
Project Humanities brings faculty, students, staff, and communities together to explore ideas and experiences that define and connect us. Through diverse programs such as performances, film and book discussions, lectures, multimedia events, conversations with artists and scholars, and demonstrations, the Project looks at humanities research as the very intersection of multiple disciplines and as the catalyst for creativity, discovery, and innovation. Humanities allow us to realize the power of imagination and possibility.

Beyond disciplines that potentially divide and separate, Project Humanities demonstrates "humanities in action." Examples include how studying a foreign language helps one learn about other people and cultures, how critical discussions of literature lead to self-discovery and self-reflection, or how humanities determine the significance of digital media like Facebook.

As part of the Office of Knowledge Enterprise Development, Project Humanities connects use-inspired research to the public through a dynamic range of programming. We connect humanities scholars with each other, across disciplines, institutions, and communities to further research at ASU.

“The humanities – the study of languages, literatures, cultures, philosophy, religions and history – are vital to creating a literate citizen. They inform our sense of who we are and our place in relationship to each other. They enhance our lives, give meaning to our professions, and provide us with the tools to think critically about society and transform it in positive and meaningful ways.” - Michael M. Crow, ASU President

“The humanities play such an important role in higher education because they expose people to different ideas, cultivate the imagination and build the skills necessary to interpret and determine the significance of information, as well as deal with a rapidly changing world.” - Elizabeth D. Phillips, ASU Provost
Project Humanities brings faculty, students, staff, and communities together to explore ideas and experiences that define and connect us. Through diverse programs such as performances, film and book discussions, lectures, multimedia events, conversations with artists and scholars, and demonstrations, the Project looks at humanities research as the very intersection of multiple disciplines and as the catalyst for creativity, discovery, and innovation. Humanities allow us to realize the power of imagination and possibility. The who, what, why, when, and how of our existence is evidence of why and how humanities matter. They give us definitions, perspective, purpose, and meaning. They allow for self-reflection and self-discovery.

Beyond disciplines that potentially divide and separate, Project Humanities demonstrates “humanities in action.” Examples include how studying a foreign language helps one learn about other people and cultures, how critical discussions of literature lead to self-discovery and self-reflection, or how humanities determine the significance of digital media like Facebook.

As part of the Office of Knowledge Enterprise Development, Project Humanities connects use-inspired research to the public through a dynamic range of programming. We connect humanities scholars with each other, across disciplines, institutions, and communities to further research at ASU.

The humanities – the study of languages, literatures, cultures, philosophy, religions and history – are vital to creating a literate citizen. They inform our sense of who we are and our place in relationship to each other. They enhance our lives, give meaning to our professions, and provide us with the tools to think critically about society and transform it in positive and meaningful ways.” - Michael M. Crow, ASU President

The humanities play such an important role in higher education because they expose people to different ideas, cultivate the imagination and build the skills necessary to interpret and determine the significance of information, as well as deal with a rapidly changing world.” - Elizabeth D. Phillips, ASU Provost

“In all things that are purely social, we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress.” - Booker T. Washington
Project Humanities explores the ways we connect with each other and make meaning of our shared experiences.

Support this effort: humanities.asu.edu